The Gray Field Uniform of the German Army
Translated by Edward K. Parker

The Imperial Cabinet order of 23 February 1910 and the Executive Decree authorized by it on 18 March 1910 introduced into the German Army a new field-gray uniform (gray-green uniform for Jäger and Schützen). This is in addition to the present uniform, which is to be retained.

On what occasions the dark blue or field-gray uniform will be worn is given in the uniform regulations published at the same time, which is the exclusive authority and is shown below:

The dark blue uniform must be worn (under the designation "dark blue uniform" all previous types of uniforms are to be understood):

a) For parades,
b) On garrison guard duty,
c) In church,
d) In law court,
e) For "walking out" and social affairs.

The field-gray uniform must be worn:

a) In the field,
b) In all battles or field exercises against an opponent wearing a more differentiating uniform than just a tag.

For all other occasions, the decision whether the dark blue or field-gray uniform will be worn is left to the local command.

Description of the Officers' Field Uniform

In the following instructions, everything is forbidden which makes the officer's uniform appear as such, it must be exactly the color of the troop's uniforms and it is especially important that it not appear brighter than theirs.

The Waffenrock (military blouse).

General

The Waffenrock is of the same cut as that of the troops. It must fit comfortably so that underwear can be worn under it. The coat tail must cover half the seat for mounted officers but all of the seat for dismounted officers, reaching 10.5 cm below the crotch.

The Waffenrock is closed by a row of 8 dull crowned buttons which have been gilded or silvered.

In the lower front part of the coat are two angled pockets cut in a curve with covering flaps, rounded at the
